
To answer your question, EPA is normally not the one to say 'it's safe'; the health department and ATSDR are examining that question and developing a number that will represent a 'safe to occupy' number. I'm not sure of that timing, but it's likely they will have that number by the end of the week. Our clearance samples were collected Sunday, so the preliminary results should be ready by Friday. If they are all non-detect, we may be able to release them same day. If we detect something, we will have to wait about a week or more for QA/QC before publicly announcing the results.

As for the other units sampled, the same will be true for the release of results. I believe they are being analyzed now. Again, if they are non-detect (I believe they will be), we may be able to release the results sooner without waiting for QA/QC. I'll check with Raj tomorrow.

I hope this was helpful...

Quick question, are you able to give me any sort of timeline when we may be able to clear the two units in the J building, as well as when we may be able to call the rest of the units "safe" according to the EPA. I know you took a few samples in I and A and I would be curious what sort of statement the EPA will release regarding the property as a whole.....
